Astronomer Will Gater commented: "Exmoor's dark night skies are an incredible treasure and this new trail is another way that people can get outside and explore the amazing sights they have to offer. Hopefully the more people see the wonders of a dark, starry sky, the more they'll want to preserve and protect these precious views for the future."

The 2-mile there and back walk starts from Larkbarrow near Exford, offering 360-degree views of the night sky over open moorland at the core of the National Park's dark sky zone. Glow-in-the-dark way markers are there to help you find your way and a printed guide is available to buy online and from National Park Centres in Lynmouth, Dunster and Dulverton.

The new trail launches ahead of the region's Exmoor Dark Skies Festival, which starts this Friday (22nd October - 7th November) offering three weeks of festivities celebrating the wonders of the night sky.

Exmoor became Europe's first International Dark Sky Reserve

We are going to expand the magazine to a larger size - a square format - we're very excited. The magazine will stand out if amongst others in this new format.

We are going to offer those who have booked a full page the option to keep their advert the same size, or for no additional cost if you'd like to use the extra space, either send us a larger advert or text to fill the page.

When your contract with us runs out, the price will go up to £150 for an inside full page.

Meantime, here are some examples as to how the space could be used.

If you have any query please contact Ceri or Claire.
